

Why Adventurous Conversations?

It can be risky to invite a colleague into supervision conversations that often involve venturing into unknown territory.

You can expect

- Professional, ethical practice
- A qualified experienced supervisor who draws on sound theoretical ideas
- To address what is most relevant and important to your practice.
- The development of a collaboratively negotiated working agreement
- Adventurous conversations

My supervision philosophy

Supervision is relational. We are all in relationships - with ourselves, with those who consult us in our work, with our work contexts, professions and personal lives.

Supervision can help to reflect on relationships and situations and develop reflexive, informed and intentional professional practice.

Theoretical approaches that inform my practice

Over the last 20 years my practice has been informed by social constructionist and poststructuralist approaches to supervision and counselling. These include a range of narrative therapies and approaches that attend to cultural and political contexts.

Contact me to arrange a complimentary 30-minute introductory consultation

Choosing a supervisor is an important step to take. I offer a no obligation complimentary 30-minute phone or online consultation to discuss the possibilities for supervision.

In our first supervision conversation

As part of a collaborative and informed working relationship we will develop a written, time-limited working agreement that includes

- Our hopes, expectations and responsibilities for our work together
- Appointment times and availability
- Our theoretical approaches
- Our ethical codes and considerations
- Session bookings, cancellation and postponement
- Documentation storage and access
- Costs and methods of payment
- Addressing concerns
- Reviewing our work

My experience and qualifications

I have worked for more than 25 years in counselling, professional supervision, group facilitation and counsellor education.

Work contexts include tertiary counselling services, tertiary education institutions, community agencies, and private practice. A key research area has been couple relationships.

Relevant qualifications include Post Grad. Cert. in Counselling. Supervision., PhD, Master of Counselling and Bachelor of Counselling.

I prefer to work in a relational way because issues rarely impact on one person and always involve social and cultural contexts.
